The close links between the climate change and the sustainable development agendas have led to growing demands for tools that can assess the multiple benefits of climate projects and policies.

These linkages also open opportunities to bring climate finance to development needs such as controlling air pollution and improving health.

Accessing this finance and improving projects and policies means policymakers need to understand how these tools can be used to improve their projects and projects.

This webinar will introduce how several international organizations and research institutions are using tools to assess the sustainable development impacts of climate change and development projects.

This webinar is part of a knowledge-exchange webinar series jointly organized by the Asian Development Bank, the Institute for Global Environmental Strategies, and the UNEP-DTU Partnership.
